

IS YOUR ORGANIZATION SERIOUS ABOUT ENERGY?

If the answer is yes, you might want to know more about ISO 50001. It is the International standard for Energy Management systems to enable organizations to design the systems and processes necessary to improve energy performance.

WHAT IS ISO 50001?

The Standard includes requirements for an energy management system (EnMS) with a focus on continual improvement in energy performance.

ARE YOU READY?

Has your organization:

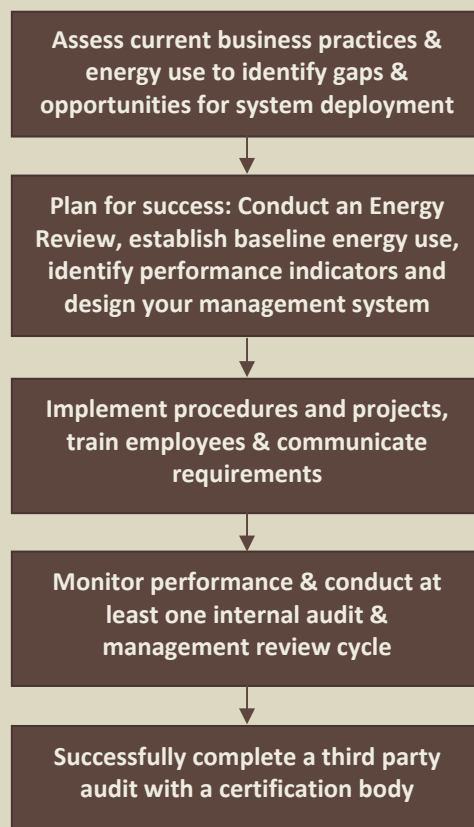

- Identified where it's significant energy uses and potential cost savings are?
- Identified projects or operations that could be implemented to achieve savings in energy or costs?
- Benchmarked with similar organizations to identify the value of implementing an EnMS?
- Created management system elements such as training, documentation, procedures, & internal audits?
- Implemented energy saving projects?

If it makes sense for your organization to reduce energy costs and ensure energy security – then the time to implement an EnMS is now.

STEPS TO SYSTEM IMPLEMENTATION

ISO 50001 provides the foundation for implementing an energy policy, and establish objectives, targets, and action plans which take into account legal requirements and information related to significant energy use.

Preparing an Energy Management System usually involves the following steps:

Keep the momentum going by celebrating success! Maintaining employee involvement is crucial to achieving ongoing outcomes.

BENEFITS OF IMPLEMENTING AN ENMS

Although relatively new to the market, ISO 50001 is receiving a lot of attention. This is largely due to the dual benefit of making clear financial sense and offering independent validation of corporate responsibility.
